KH: Thank you Philippe that was really interesting! Do you have any more information on how nature is constructed in the book of genesis?

EJ: Very interesting perspective. Thank you.

YP: thank you

Pv: thanks Philippe for this view

JB: Thank you. A core topic. I enjoyed some of your insights very much. thought provoking.

PE: Hello Everyone, I'm here to welcome comments and questions

PE: Thank you Malte

PE: @Marie-Anne : Philippe Descola gives interesting examples in different books, I would also recommend Marshall Sahlins

PE: Dalziel Quinn also has great reflections on all this

PE: Sorry, Daniel Quinn

PE: I don't have a more specific source for ethnobotany

PE: in indigenous cultures. I gathered information here and there

PE: But François Couplan also has some great stuff in "La Nature nous sauvera" (Nature will save us, don't know if it's been translated)

PE: @Karoline : sorry, I don't but just reading the text is quite telling

PE: oops, sorry again : François Couplan

PE: @Karoline : aside from the theological aspect, if you want to dig the subject you would have to look at how monotheist religions appeared in the wake of grain agriculture

PE: Thank you all for your comments !

MR: This is a great observation, Phillippe.

MR: Marie-Anne, I have a book on my reading list you may want to look at too. It's called "Tending the Wild", about Californian peoples use of the land..

MH: I would really love to hear about any further readings in ethnobotany, indigenous forest management, etc...

MH: Being originally from Canada, with native American ancestry, it's always been fascinating to me the concept of human managed sustainable large scale forest gardens.

MH: thanks Robin, found that one today coincidentally XD

MH: Thanks!

MH: I found this one today which I am considering: Ancient Pathways, Ancestral Knowledge:

MH: thank you

TB: Need to change & need to cool down !

AA: Thank you!

RK: @Marie-Anne: I can highly recommend "Braiding sweetgrass" of Robin Wall-Kimmerer

Ss: Thanks for this!

JF: Thank you Phillippe.

JS: Thank you Philippe!

PL: Thank you for giving such a deep perspective and not in your native language!

GN: Thankyou. I liked the illustration/metaphor to clarify the paradox. Maybe a new spiritual paradigm can join the two fundamentals together. Very interesting!
